The 2008 United States presidential election was one of the most consequential and exciting in American history. Barack Obama, a young and charismatic senator from Illinois, became the first African American to be nominated for president by a major political party. His opponent was John McCain, a veteran senator from Arizona and a decorated war hero. The race was also marked by the presence of two strong female candidates: Hillary Clinton, a former First Lady and senator from New York, and Sarah Palin, the governor of Alaska.

The Democratic primary was a contentious affair, with Obama and Clinton battling it out for the nomination. Obama eventually emerged victorious, but not before Clinton had mounted a strong challenge. The Republican primary was less competitive, with McCain easily securing the nomination.

The general election campaign was a hard-fought contest, with both Obama and McCain campaigning aggressively. Obama ultimately won the election, becoming the 44th president of the United States. His victory was a historic moment, marking the first time that an African American had been elected to the highest office in the land.

Obama and the Clintons, McCain and Palin: The Race of a Lifetime is a gripping account of the 2008 election. Author Mark Halperin provides a behind-the-scenes look at the campaigns, offering insights into the strategies and personalities of the candidates. The book is a must-read for anyone interested in American politics or the history of the United States.

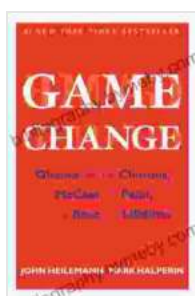

Here are some of the key events that shaped the 2008 election:

- The Democratic primaries: Obama and Clinton engaged in a heated battle for the Democratic nomination. Obama eventually emerged victorious, but not before Clinton had mounted a strong challenge.

- The Republican primaries: McCain easily secured the Republican nomination, facing little competition from his rivals.
- The general election campaign: Obama and McCain campaigned aggressively, with both candidates making their case to the American people.
- The election results: Obama won the election, becoming the 44th president of the United States. His victory was a historic moment, marking the first time that an African American had been elected to the highest office in the land.

Obama and the Clintons, McCain and Palin: The Race of a Lifetime is a fascinating account of one of the most important elections in American history. The book provides a valuable perspective on the candidates, the campaigns, and the outcome of the election. It is a must-read for anyone interested in American politics or the history of the United States.
