Eleanor Roosevelt was a tireless advocate for social justice and human rights. She was the longest-serving First Lady of the United States, serving from 1933 to 1945, and she used her platform to champion issues such as civil rights, women's rights, and economic equality.

Roosevelt was born in New York City in 1884. Her parents were both wealthy and influential, but they died when she was young, and she was raised by her grandmother. Roosevelt attended private schools and then studied at Allenswood, a finishing school in England. She married Franklin Delano Roosevelt in 1905, and they had six children.

Roosevelt began her career in public service in the early 1920s, when she worked as a volunteer at a settlement house in New York City. She was also active in the League of Women Voters and the Women's Trade Union League. In 1928, her husband was elected governor of New York, and she became the state's First Lady.

As First Lady, Roosevelt used her platform to promote her social justice agenda. She spoke out against discrimination and poverty, and she advocated for the rights of women and workers. She also traveled extensively, visiting schools, hospitals, and factories throughout the United States.

In 1945, Roosevelt's husband died, and she became a widow. She continued to be active in public service, serving as a delegate to the United Nations and as the chair of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights. She also wrote several books and articles about her experiences and beliefs.

Roosevelt died in New York City in 1962. She is remembered as one of the most influential first ladies in American history, and her legacy of social justice and activism continues to inspire people today.
